This ground-breaking book by Adrian Gray, a former SICI Executive Committee member, shows that school inspection has been a key factor in the European educational landscape for 200 years. Its impact was evident to commentators from the early 1800s, but its history was often turbulent due to rapid political and social change. The book also shows how inspection and evaluation approaches have changed and developed, especially over the last fifty years, reflecting changing ideas about school leadership and accountability – and also responding to technical changes like new data and exam systems. It is a story that combines both politics at a continental scale and the human details of life as an inspector from Portugal to Russia. It shows the mistakes of the past and offers pointers to avoid them in future.

This book carries important messages for SICI as we seek to grow and extend its influence on best inspection practice. The content of the book is ideal for educationalists, school leaders and school inspectors. The content will be of great value for education policy makers and inspectors globally as we see how inspection works in different national contexts.
